that when the tab is depressed, the end of a running tape is stopped. A typical cassette of the foregoing type has a body which is comprised of two generally identical halves or sections. In the assembled state, the two halves or sections are each a generally rectangular shaped member of essentially uniform thickness, but the two halves are brought together at a selected area to form a tape cassette of desired size. When the cassette is in use, a leader of a desired length is wound about a pair of hubs provided on the cassette body, and the free end of the leader is guided to the back of the cassette by the hubs. The leader is connected to a tape which has a first end connected to a takeup hub and a second end provided with an opening therein for receiving a free end of another leader. A takeup reel is associated with the takeup hub on which is wound the leader which has been guided to the back of the cassette. In use, after a leader has been unwound from the takeup hub, the free end of the leader extends from the cassette through the opening in the tape. As the leader is wound on the takeup hub it is fed from the takeup hub through the opening in the tape for a desired length. When the desired length of the leader is reached the leader is fed to a takeup reel on which the leader is pulled around to the front of the cassette body to bring a new length of leader onto the takeup hub. The continuous winding and unwinding of a leader

The aim of this study was to establish hepatocellular carcinoma-derived cell lines. MTF and BRL-3A rat hepatoma cells were treated with dimethylnitrosamine (DMN) or thioacetamide (TA) for 15 weeks, and then cultured in soft agarose to form cell colonies. Morphologically, the cells were arranged in clusters, and their sizes increased with time. In these colonies, only mono- and binucleate cells were detectable. The number of the cell colonies treated with TA was smaller than that treated with DMN. The morphological features of the cells, as well as the number of cell colonies, indicated that some degree of carcinogen-induced cell transformation occurred. The present result indicates that the cell lines have properties of hepatoma-derived cells.LOBSTER FRYING 101 The seafood industry is a bit
