Radial artery harvesting is frequently performed during total wrist arthrodesis (TWA). However, the impact of this procedure on perioperative and postoperative outcomes is largely unknown. We hypothesized that there is no difference in outcomes associated with radial artery harvesting. Between 2004 and 2013, the database of the Department of Spinal Surgery was searched for patients who underwent TWA.

The primary outcome measure was the difference in operative time between patients with and without radial artery harvesting. Secondary outcome measures included infection rates and functional outcomes. A total of 169 patients were included. Mean age of the patients was 52 years (range 17-82), and 78% were men. There was no difference in demographics, diagnosis, preoperative or postoperative surgical position, or reported wound size between patients who underwent radial artery harvesting and those who did not. The mean operative time was significantly longer in the radial artery harvesting group (117 vs. 95 minutes, $p = 0.001$). There was no difference in postoperative infection rate or preoperative or postoperative functional outcomes. Radial artery harvesting does not lead to a shorter operating time, is associated with an increased rate of postoperative infection, and does not improve postoperative functional outcomes or fusion rates.
