And The Problem Of Volume. One of the most difficult and controversial issues that can affect an automobile company is managing the number of vehicles that are sold. More than a century of experience with factories has taught us that the history of one plant depends on the past history of the company, its plant, its competitors, and many other factors; the patterns repeat themselves after a time. If the economy improves and the company's sales increase, the employees are happy, and the company's management is more confident than ever, the first task is to make sure that the plant will be able to produce an adequate number of vehicles. The management must be realistic, but it must also maintain a high level of optimism. It is an important exercise, this observing of a balance between optimism and realism. We must be able to anticipate and plan. By doing this, we can lead the employees to a higher level of motivation that is needed. In any plant, there are employees who work hard and do what needs to be done; there are also employees who sometimes do not do what needs to be done. These employees are often referred to as absentee workers; their numbers affect the company's bottom line. highlighted the importance of their ability to correctly forecast and plan for their assembly plants. They have encountered problems with their assembly plants, and it has required a great deal of their time and resources to rectify the problems.

However, in recent years, the primary method of increasing volume has been to reduce labor costs.

With labor costs at the lowest level in a decade, and inventory low, vehicle production has improved dramatically, albeit too late for the 2012 model year. However, investors in automakers are holding their breath for a recovery of vehicle sales in 2013. The auto industry has suffered through seven years of a general decline in volume. The president and CEO of GM stated that a doubling in volume is expected. In the past, the primary instrument used to manage volume was overhead reduction. Fixed cost reduction and better workforce management are key factors in increasing the plant's
