The non-specific Ca-dependent calmodulin-sensitive enzyme (CADE) activity in rabbit muscle was investigated. Our data suggest that this enzyme is heat labile and that there is considerable Ca-independent CADE activity in vitro. The evidence for Ca-independent activity is that despite the fact that the enzyme activity was observed in the absence of Ca-ionophore (A23187), in the presence of 100 nM A23187 no change in CADE activity was observed. In addition, the time-course of the activation of CADE was monitored and it was observed to be independent of the presence of Ca-ionophore. Addition of rabbit skeletal muscle calmodulin ( $K_d = 0.23$  nM) to the assay system increased Ca-dependent CADE activity by about five times, which is consistent with the data obtained previously in intact tissue. Further evidence for the independence of Ca-dependent CADE from Ca-ion
