Description: Remote Software Inventory (RSI) is a powerful administrative tool that can be used to scan and inventory software, configuration, and content on remote client computers, laptops, and/or other connected devices. Users can use this tool to create an audit log that details any software and configuration changes that have been applied to their target systems. From the configuration audit log, users can generate reports, which include detailed inventory information. RSI is used by system administrators to search for and identify software programs that have not been used within specified time frames. RSI Benefits: RSI utilizes the remote software inventory protocol (RSI protocol) to transfer audit log data. Using the RSI protocol, audit log data is collected from remote computers, and then evaluated locally. RSI can be used to identify software and software-related activity that have occurred on remote computers in previous operating systems. The audit log will also record all changes that occur on remote computers, including software installs, uninstallations, hardware installs, hardware uninstalls, and more. Audit log data can also include any configuration changes that may have occurred on remote computers. Results are gathered within a few minutes to a few hours of initiating the scan, depending on the number of remote systems being scanned. RSI Benefits: The configuration audit log for RSI can be used to generate reports, which can be exported as a PDF for an easier reading experience.
