I'm curious if there is a term for a material that has "bits" or "building blocks" that are to be assembled to make a complete material. For example, wool consists of fibres, and clothing consists of wool, cotton, and other building blocks. A: A related word is substrate. An underlying substrate is a basic substance or class of substances that provides support or material for something. A: When you say something is "made of" stuff, you usually mean that the substance is continuous and uninterrupted; everything goes all the way through the material. For example, "He is made of wood." If you are referring to discrete "bits," it's "broken down" or "a material made of particles." A: Solid materials have certain "constituents" that are large (the whole) or very small (the individual atoms). But materials are also "constituted" or "composed" of certain constituents. That is, a material may be made up of certain substances and atoms or a combination of substances and atoms These materials are A substance and atoms are the constituents. They are the material while substances and atoms are the made up of The material consists of substances and atoms. It's made up of The material is
