In situ stabilization of uranium tailings using sulphate reducers and iron-oxidizing bacteria is investigated in this study. After a period of 20 months, surface tailings with high concentrations of U(VI) show low concentrations of U(VI). Simulated leaching experiments indicate that tailings with high U(VI) concentrations are chemically stable. After the same period of time, tailings with low U(VI) concentrations show increased U(VI) in the leachate. Using ultrafiltration techniques, we could separate the soluble particulate phase from tailings with high and low U(VI) concentrations. In the soluble phase, U(VI) concentrations are related to pH and U(VI) speciation. pH effects were especially seen in samples with high U(VI) concentrations. The U(VI) speciation in the soluble phase is in good accordance with the speciation in the aqueous phase. Furthermore, we could show that the mineral 09e8f5149f
