Expression of proteases in Trypanosoma cruzi at the onset of infection. Trypanosoma cruzi and its intermediate host, the protozoan Euglenozoa, have developed a major strategy to modulate protein secretion of host cells, which ultimately facilitates the invasion process. The differential expression of proteases during the course of infection, could be a key to understanding this parasite-host interaction. To address this question, we used a previously developed cDNA-based array approach which allows the simultaneous expression profiling of human enzymes. Analysis of the differential expression of these genes showed that the lytic forms of the parasite, trypomastigotes and epimastigotes, are characterized by a clear-cut over-expression of a larger number of genes, including a large set of proteases.
