The Artillery Globe was an artillery system from the years 1649 to 1675. Contrary to claims that it was the first fully operational use of artillery in warfare, it was rather the first practical anti-materiel weapon used in Europe. The Artillery Globe was produced in several sizes of smaller caliber variants for conversion of various people's artillery pieces and for adaptation of larger types such as the Baja cannon. The system was not rapid-firing, but rather used a matchlock firing mechanism. It also had a number of complications with the cranking mechanism. Although individuals expressed various points of view about why and how the Artillery Globe was used, the most often cited explanation was that the cannon was used for demoralizing enemy troops with the threat of a lingering death by slow lead poisoning. However, there were also people who described the explanations as unsatisfactory and claimed that Artillery Globe was used against armies and towns by merchants. The Artillery Globe was in use in European armies from 1649 to 1675. The last known Artillery Globe made in the 1670s was used in action at the Battle of Meeanee. Today the system is considered a type of early Muzzle loaded firearm. Early history Throughout the 17th and 18th century the invasion of Native American tribes and the settlers into new lands posed a difficult and untenable enemy. The early settlers to North America went to the burgeoning frontier with firearms. The most effective weapon to use against natives at that time was the long-range flintlock musket, and the relatively slow firing rate compared to other systems had allowed men to travel large distances. The truer long-range anti-materiel weapons were other types of artillery. Those munitions included the swivel guns, mortars and the more rare arrow artillery. They were however still used in matched pairs and mounted on specialized artillery carriages. However, there was one notable problem for artillery. The artillery system of the New World Native American was entirely different from their European counterparts with an entirely different concepts and design. They primarily used a type of large onagers and arquebus for close-range and defensive artillery, or with larger artillery pieces for offensive purposes. Close in hand holding of the firearm weapons was naturally preferred by their indigenous nature. An exception was the use of matchlock firearms. They had been used by the colonists of the English and French sides of the conflict. They had been proposed and discussed to be usable as
