The German government's aid to Greece in the form of "short-term loans" has a politically motivated motivation. Given the billions of Euros the Greek government has blown on supplementing the pensions of Greeks who have fallen on hard times and who were forced to live on social welfare, the German government is not going to let that hard-earned money go to waste. Its only aim is to line the pockets of German banks and the credit-rating agencies, and to hinder Europe's efforts to confront the single currency crisis. Nonetheless, the hypocrisy of Germany's political stance is self-evident, particularly since Germany is taking a different position with regard to Hungary. It is Germany that is not calling for a moratorium on further expansion of the European Union, and Germany that is bailing out Spanish banks and company pension funds with hundreds of billions of Euros. Germany is more than happy to let the markets decide about the fate of the European integration process, and thus to leave the responsibility for its effects on its head, to the Greek and Hungarian people. Germans are widely known for their great love for the European Union, but there is also a social and political historical background for this. After German unification, a large section of the European population needed to be kept under control. Germany's fear of social unrest and labor unrest remained a factor in German decision-making throughout the period of German re-unification. The Berlin consensus was formed by the German political elite, and the benefits of this were of greater interest than the risks. The sanctions to the east, the German army and the state-capitalist economic model were politically necessary in the eyes of the German political elite, and it is only Germany's role in the EU today, which exposes its hypocrisy. Political ideological hysteria about "German expansion" In fact, the political hysteria about "German expansion" in the European Union is nothing more than a bourgeois-conservative and right-wing parliamentary hypocrisy. For years, the German public has been told about the danger of an "immigration crisis", a "socialist threat" and a "European financial union" – all of which have been thoroughly disproven by the German political establishment, and Germany itself has rejected any European federal transfers to the east in the financial crisis. The debt crisis in the eurozone and the problems of the single currency have only worsened since Angela Merkel and Gerhard Schröder decided to join the eurozone under the condition that Greece would be excluded from the euro.
