The game is published as a free-to-play game on iOS and Android apps but the developer does not provide these in their websites. I somehow managed to make a copy of it on my iPad. It's looking a bit lame, but it works.

Like this: Like Loading...Q: Asynchronous Socket.io Between Multiple Users I'm using socket.io to create a chat room and I have around 1500 clients on my server. Each client connects and joins the room. I just noticed that all clients are also sending the message to the other clients automatically. If a user sends a message through the client, all other connected users also get the message. I set up my code like so. app.js io = require('socket.io').listen(app); ./server/index.js require('bower_components/socket.io-client/socket.io.js')(io); Each client will execute io.sockets.on('connection', function (socket) { socket.on('join', function(data) { io.sockets.in(data.to, function(data) { console.log('Chat Room!' + data.from + ', '+ data.to); }) }); }); app.js var express = require('express'); var app = express(); app.set('views', __dirname + '/views'); app.set('view engine', 'jade'); app.set('port', process.env.PORT || 3000); app.set('host', 'localhost'); app.listen(app.get('port'), function() { console.log('Express server listening on port %s in %s mode', this.get('port'), app.get('env')); }); The chat room works fine and each client is a different connection. However, I get the following message over and over again from each client: From the client: Chat Room! localhost:3000, undefined From client: Chat Room! localhost:3000, undefined Is it possible for each client to send a unique message and not cause each other to receive it? A: When you use socket.io (in your case via socket.io-client), you are using a peer-to-peer architecture - the socket does not know about any other socket. In order to avoid this, socket.io has a persistent connection model with long-lived (long ping times)
