Analyzing systems biology in the context of the evolving field of healthcare delivery. The objective of this study is to find the optimal way to effectively manage the delivery of healthcare in the era of systems biology. The authors propose a means to allow healthcare providers to become more familiar with the vastly growing bodies of the literature pertaining to biomedicine, while still gaining a correct understanding of systems biology and its practical application. The principle proposed by this study consists of 4 stages: 1) Evaluation of the user's expertise in biomedicine (Stage 1). This consists of taking the user's perspective of the complex text in question. 2) Conducting an "expert review" (Stage 2). This consists of identifying the core content of the text, and capturing and structuring it into the "queries", a means of structuring the information contained in the text into a format that is easier to understand. 3) Conducting an "evidence review" (Stage 3). This consists of assessing all supporting information that can be logically derived from the knowledge that was obtained in Stage 2. This allows the user to understand the role of the documented information in conjunction with the textual (Stage 2) information. Finally, 4) Retrieving necessary information (Stage 4). This consists of using web-based search engines, e.g., PubMed, to find the relevant content that has been analyzed by stages 2 and 3. This allows the user to recognize all the concepts that are most important, so that they can more easily be reviewed later on. Since little research has been done to date on the use of systems biology, we expect that this study will lead to a new understanding and delivery of healthcare by the public.
