Various designs and configurations of circuit interrupters are known and used. Circuit interrupters are commonly used to interrupt the flow of current in power transmission lines. The interrupter is usually mounted on a frame adapted to be mounted on insulators on the ground surface. A typical circuit interrupter is illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 4,133,220. That patent discloses a circuit interrupter having a handle which is pivotally mounted on the frame of the interrupter. A trip actuator is mounted on the handle and is connected to toggle an operating mechanism. The operating mechanism is connected to electrical contacts which are adapted to open and close an electrical circuit including the transmission line and contactor of the circuit interrupter. A problem with interrupters of the type illustrated in the patent is that it is difficult to locate the interrupter within the path of a circuit breaker. If the circuit breaker is closed and a fault occurs, the line voltage is impressed on the operating mechanism which is mounted on the handle of the circuit interrupter and the handle is caused to move rapidly. The moving handle can be very dangerous to an operator who is unfortunate enough to be standing next to the interrupter at that time. Typically, the frame of the circuit interrupter is constructed of stamped sheet metal. The metal used to construct the frame does not dissipate the electrical current which is caused to be impressed on the frame during a
