-1 - Exploration: Exploration is a form of open-ended computer game genre that focuses on game play and design. Exploration takes place on a 3D virtual world with the goal of completing the given mission. Exploration is an acquired skill and usually carries a primary emphasis on game play and overcoming the obstacles that may prevent advancement through the game, but also on exploration for its own sake, and some players may choose to complete a game without the goal of the game. Game worlds designed for exploration may have dangerous landscapes or creatures that the player must navigate, and may have visual or audiovisual effects that guide the player through the world -2 - Theoretical exploration: Theoretical exploration is a derivative of exploration, developed in the late 1980s and early 1990s, that uses research, observation, and deduction to acquire information or knowledge on a particular topic. In the context of the computer, it is related to learning how to read the executable code of an application or how to operate a specific hardware device. The principle is to write or modify an application in order to obtain information, usually by directly observing the machine's behavior when executed. -3 - Metaphorical exploration: Metaphorical exploration is the act of investigating an object or thing and the process by which it comes to be known, and an analogy is drawn between the object and its characteristics and some other object or knowledge. For example, writing and reading may be seen as metaphorical explorations of a subject because the learner explores the subject by expressing ideas in a text. The same may be said of oral discourse; that is, listening to the analogy may lead to new knowledge. -4 - Exploratory Game Design: Exploratory Game Design is a developmental approach to game design where the challenge of a game is based upon a unique environment of the player/user. It emphasizes the player's experience in a fully immersive and original environment, and challenges the player to discover new ways to play. -5 - User-centered software design: User-centered software design is a stage of software development which involves searching for the needs of the user in the design process. What's new in Urban Legends : The Dry Body:

The 2008 introduction was a dry summer. The same happened in 2009. But we are now into 2010 (after the usual winter-spring transition delay where some days went by, some others by a year...) and the weather was fairly fine on the first and maybe only week of the month. Morning (and daytime) temperatures were between 20° and 30°, and nights were pleasant. Highs this summer have been mostly about 28°. There was a very pretty day in August, Sunday, when the temperature and the humidity were low, about 20°. The first case that we had been able to identify, albeit it was also the first we had been aware of, was about 6 to 7 weeks ago, when a hung and disoriented man, on his way to work, passed by a bar in the old industrial area, a lot of factories and other very old buildings. A wails was heard, not unharfull, but not the workers' usual sings, and the man was seen to dance frantically, as if he were intoxicated, and raising waves of spittle, which were covered with mucous and blood. The worker, Daniel, talked to the unfortunate, and he was quite certain that this unknown man was in a bad shape, and that he was out of his right mind. When he made off from the scene, Daniel didn't have much hope about the poor soul's health. He also didn't dare to warn the other workers about what he had just seen. Then, in the past week, we had a lot of cases. They were similar to the one and to Daniel's. They showed signs of severe dehydration, and of being rooted to a spot of blood. All of them were about the same time, and all of them had been seen several blocks away from work. We had suspected that all of the victims had gone to work together, as the places where the incidents occurred, were places around the circle of the massive industrial area in the north of the city. Daniel was quite sure that the victims were not employed in the art industry, because, he said, they were not in very good health, they never demonstrated intoxication, and they were always in a good mood on working day. Daniel didn't know what to think. Luckily, most of them had been found by other workers (we didn't have any callers) and before this critical situation, they had been found in a good state of
