To compare the therapeutic efficacy of uvulopalatopharyngoplasty (UPPP) and botulinum toxin injection on the upper airway of nonobese patients with obstructive sleep apnea hypopnea syndrome (OSAHS). Forty consecutive patients with OSAHS were enrolled. They were randomized into two groups; one group (group A) received UPPP, and the other group (group B) received injected botulinum toxin into the soft palate and posterior oropharyngeal wall.

Polysomnographic examinations were performed before and after the surgery or treatment. Apnea/hypopnea index (AHI), minimal oxygen saturation (MIN(O(2))) and snoring index (SI) were recorded. Subjective evaluation was made by a questionnaire. The follow-up rate was 100%. Eighteen patients in group A and 17 patients in group B had follow-up records. (1) Following treatment, the AHI, minimum oxygen saturation, SI and the proportion of obstructive apnea/hypopnea in group A and group B were significantly decreased (P 0.05). (3) Both the surgical success and symptom improvement rates in the nonobese group were significantly higher than those in the obese group. (1) UPPP could be a good choice for nonobese patients with OSAHS. (2) The efficacy of botulinum toxin injection was restricted to the nonobese population. (3) If the patient's BMI was lower than 30 kg/m(2), botulinum toxin injection could be an alternative therapy for OSAHS
