You're here because you're in need of a lightweight graphics editor for your website or small business. This list contains the 13 best alternatives to Photoshop for web designers. What is Photoshop Elements? Adobe Photoshop Elements (PSE) is an image editor for graphics editors, web designers and hobbyists. It offers an alternative to traditional Photoshop, and is much simpler to use. Does it replace Photoshop? You may use Elements and Photoshop together, and Elements is generally good enough for most tasks that Photoshop is more powerful for. However, your creative opportunities are limited. Adobe Photoshop requires a monthly subscription to be able to edit media types that are not native to Elements (see What types of media can I edit in Photoshop Elements?). The learning curve and file format conversion difficulties will make it harder to use Elements for big projects. If you need to save images in a PDF for printing, you may need Photoshop. PSE is less capable than Photoshop. It does not have most of the Photoshop features, such as layers, the ability to create and modify type, masking, spot healing, photo montage, and transferring a photo from another image. Although you can create graphics that are similar to those produced with Photoshop, Elements is not a stand-alone graphics editor. How do I know which version of Photoshop to use? Currently, you need to use either Photoshop or Elements to edit images. But, Photoshop supports some older formats that you may want to use to edit images. You need to be careful of which version of Photoshop you use; Photoshop and Elements do not always keep up with one another. The latest versions of Elements are constantly being updated to include new features (compared to what they had in the previous version). Unlike Photoshop, Elements is continually free to use (except when it updates to a paid subscription). Caveats For most people, Elements will provide all the editing functionality they require. However, there are some limitations to Photoshop, and Elements cannot replicate Photoshop capabilities. For example, if you're editing a PDF for printing, you'll have to use Photoshop. Also, the software isn't as capable when it comes to editing a canvas. For more complex or advanced designs, you'll still need Photoshop. And finally, Photoshop is the professional standard for graphics work. It 388ed7b0c7

Q: How to get the parent template(s) in backbone? I have a collection of users that display in a template. There are various ul's and li's in there that contain links to the users profile. I want to have a function that checks that the user url is associated with an existing user. I need to know which li's contain the user's url. I've tried everything from console.log('current template'); to Backbone.history.fragment('#home'); I get undefined for the current template or 'home' for fragment. I'm not asking anyone to write my code, I'm just looking for a point in the right direction. A: It depends on where you want to test, assuming you would like to test this at the view level, you can do this by calling.get('current-template') (more info on custom view names) If you're writing the test, you should actually grab that information from what route is given to the route handler. For example, if you have an index route set up like so: UsersCollection = Backbone.Collection.extend({ url : "/users", initialize: function() { this.bind("add", this.render, this); } }); UsersView = Backbone.View.extend({ template: _.template($('#user-template').html()), render: function() { var self = this; var template = this.template; var users = this.collection.models; _.each(users, function(user) { console.log(user.toJSON()); }); $(this.el).html(template({users: users})); return this; } }); You would use the render method inside of the route handler to get whatever users are in your collection and then pass them to the view when rendering: routes: { '' :

Q: Can I use cURL to extract data from a webpage? I am trying to pull the name of the stadium from a website and place it in a text file. I have read that cURL can do this, but I'm not sure how to implement it. Here is my current code: $curl = curl_init(); curl_setopt_array($curl, array(CURLOPT_URL => "", CURLOPT_RETURNTRANSFER => true, CURLOPT_HEADER => false, CURLOPT_ENCODING => '', CURLOPT_CONNECTTIMEOUT => 10, CURLOPT_TIMEOUT => 10, CURLOPT_USERAGENT => 'Mozilla/5.0 (Windows; U; Windows NT 6.0; en-GB; rv:1.9.2.5) Gecko/20100115 Firefox/3.6.5')); $content = curl_exec($curl); I had a look through the PHP cURL documentation and haven't found an answer. A: As you can see cURL is basically HTTP request library for PHP. You can read a page like this: $html_string = file_get_contents(''); //Some validation of $html_string is necessary $doc = new DOMDocument(); $doc->loadHTML($html_string); $xpath = new DOMXPath($doc); $elements = $xpath->query("//table[@class='info']/tr/td[@class='name']/b"); print_r($elements); As you can see $elements is array of all table elements (for instance , ...), with simple XPath querying you can easily extract any information from page, knowing only few basics. For your case I would suggest looking at normal PHP file
