by Brendan Long Stand in your shower. Listening to the water roar, suppress any thoughts of what you could be doing. Don't think about how long you've been waiting, how much you'll miss it when it's through. Don't think about the fact that, while you're massaging your tense, disturbed body, you'll be dry and warm by the time the water stops running. Life is for reciprocity. You shower with the added understanding that someone else will reciprocate, maybe not exactly as you'd like, but certainly in a way that fits their own needs. You shower with the knowledge that the water rushes by on its way to washing away the accumulated waste of the past, and the thing you're taking care of was once alive and is now about to be so again. You shower with the knowledge that you are preparing for the cycles of nature that will consume the dry waste, and draw it back down again, and ultimately return your own waste to the Earth. You shower with the knowledge that you are paying someone else a little bit of your intimate attention. The ending of the shower is when there's nothing left for anyone to reciprocate. You should first apologize for the tardiness of your response. Your response, in fact, is how I know that you're not human. We crawl from the bath, blinking in the dimness, and we cast about for a towel. You're different. You aren't trying to relieve yourself. You don't understand how good it is to have a lovely hot shower. Your head is turned sideways, straining to see the room full of towels. "You mean — there aren't any?" "If you want to wear that to work," you're told, pointing to a manila envelope, "you'll have to rent another one." Our showers usually run the same length, and if the shower finishes in the usual time, they
