The films are played through one of the screens, using a motorized carousel. This form of entertainment was invented by the Googie group of architects during the 1950s. Concept Drive-in theaters were the first hot dog stands to gain a following, and like the hot dog stands, they gave people something to do while they waited for their movie (and after they had their film developed). Drive-in theaters did not charge admission in the 1950s and 1960s, which made the theaters more accessible for the general public. History The earliest drive-in theaters opened in late 1939 and 1940 and started in the San Fernando Valley in Southern California and in the San Joaquin Valley of California, with the first drive-in theater opening in the United States in Alhambra, California in 1939. Due to the frequency of devastating fires in California, drive-in theaters were not a common place of entertainment until the 1950s, however they were a popular place of entertainment in the summers of 1952 to 1956. By 1952, more than 2,000 drive-in theaters had been built. Drive-in theaters still remain in popular culture and are found in amusement parks and a number of other locations around the world. Many amusement parks began offering a drive-in theater in the late-1960s. Most drive-in theaters now are available free of charge to patrons (though some charge for parking).
