Q: Append attributes when saving a django model instance? New to Django and was wondering if it's possible to append additional user-defined attributes to an instance, when that instance is stored in the database. In my case, I have a User class and want a method that saves a User's profile, which includes the email and the user's name. The reason I want it is that later on, I want to split out the user data into it's own model, but I'm trying to be as minimalistic as possible, so I don't have to duplicate the code. Thanks! A: Django will automatically create a new instance of your model whenever you call model.save(...). If you want to save the additional information you can use the 'instance' keyword argument to save the instance. To load the new information you can use the Meta class to read the properties you added. Q: How to combine GoogleSheets Data to a Google Sheets Form? I have a Google Sheet with the following columns: Time User Duration 10:00 User1 2m45s 10:15 User2 1h1m 11:00 User3 4h22m 11:30 User4 2h35m I have a Google Forms built with the following template: Name Phone Email User1 xxxxxx xxxxxx User2 xxxxxx xxxxxx User3 xxxxxx xxxxxx User4 xxxxxx xxxxxx In the same sheet I have a button, "test". Is it possible to create a script that will add the current "duration" from the 2nd column, to the corresponding "name" column? I've seen some examples about the spreadsheet.getRange() function, but it's for a range of cells. I've seen this question. The answer mentions using Google Apps Script, but I'm not 100% sure about the "script" part, and I don't know how to make that work. Thank you A: You can use the following code. var ss = SpreadsheetApp.getActiveSpreadsheet(); var sheet = ss
