What's New in the?

Donald Trump's allegation that Barack Obama wiretapped his phones at Trump Tower is the latest remarkable example of a president's peddling a non-existent conspiracy theory. But as New York University law professor Michael Segalov wrote in a provocative essay for The Weekly Standard, Obama's wiretapping accusation is an interesting counterpoint to another non-starter that President Trump has tossed around in recent months: Obama's role in the "Muslim ban" targeting people from a number of Muslim-majority countries, like Syria and Yemen. Obama's response to President Trump's Muslim ban is instructive for understanding how unlikely it is that Trump will ever be able to put his administration on a stable path. "If I had a son, he would look like Donald Trump," Obama told an audience in Saudi Arabia last summer. As president, he didn't appoint a single Republican official to his administration. Trump is apparently determined to continue Obama's hard line against Iran — a bellicose stance that has led to the current crisis between the two countries. But as Segalov points out, Obama "was widely expected to take a harder line on Iran than Bush." Considering the numerous intelligence reports about Iran's nuclear program, the Obama administration took great pains to ensure that any new sanctions against Iran were fully blocked by the U.N. Security Council. Trump hasn't been nearly as aggressive in applying sanctions to Iran, and has backed away from U.N. sanctions altogether. His administration has opened a back channel to Iran — signaling that they're willing to speak to the country in hopes of resolving this crisis. But Trump has ignored Obama's warnings on Iran as well. And in a sick irony, the new Republican president is now claiming, not unlike Trump Tower, that he's been wiretapped by the Obama administration. This bizarre analogy is possible because both Trump's ban on travelers from the countries affected by the U.N. sanctions and his wiretapping accusations can be traced back to a 35-page, 2011-era report on jihad. That report, which was written by a panel of intelligence officials, was based on classified information, but it's now widely available. It concluded that jihadists are plotting to do "acts of war" against the U.S. and that there is a "widespread" effort among j
