The optimal modality for anticoagulation in postsurgical patients receiving long-term warfarin therapy for the prevention of thromboembolism is unknown. To compare the efficacy and safety of two warfarin dosing regimens, weight-based therapy versus target international normalized ratio (INR) with the C-INR, in a randomized, placebo-controlled trial in patients with previous deep vein thrombosis (DVT) or pulmonary embolism (PE). Eligible patients with previous DVT or PE took a 3-week warfarin loading dose followed by a continuous maintenance dose of warfarin adjusted to INR within a target range of 2 to 3.5 with weight-based (target weekly dose = 40 mg) or empiric (target C-INR = 2.0) dosing protocols. Study outcomes were major bleeding, minor bleeding, and overall thromboembolic and bleeding complications. In the warfarin group (n = 661), overall thromboembolic events occurred in 7.8% and major bleeding occurred in 1.5%. Major bleeding was significantly higher with empiric dosing (6.6% vs 1.0% with weight-based dosing; P
