Furthermore,

they can be used to manufacture miniature devices that are not yet available from the conventional methods. The conventional method of producing a microfluidic device from a fabrication process is performed by using a microfabrication technique, such as wet etching using a metal mask or ion milling. This is a method of etching a mold using photolithography and a metal mask, and then producing the device by bonding a suitable resin on the etching face. However, this method cannot produce a device with a thickness of less than 1 µm, and the process of creating the mold is time consuming. In addition, it requires high-precision techniques and expensive facilities. Furthermore, this method is problematic in that the produced microchannels are not closed, and the produced microchannels have small diameters of approximately 70 μm. Another method of producing a microfluidic device is a method of bonding a capillary, which is an inner space of a glass tube, on a substrate by using thermocompression bonding. However, this method has a problem in that the pressure applied to the system using the capillary is too high, and thus the inner diameter of the capillary may be eroded. Furthermore, the durability of the bonding between the capillary and the substrate is low. Another method for producing a microfluidic device is a method of bonding a glass fiber filter, which serves as a gap material between a nozzle and a substrate, on a substrate using glass bonding, thermocompression bonding, or a method of coating a substrate with silicone and bonding the coated substrate using the thermocompression bonding method. However, the product obtained by this method requires precise positioning and alignment at a level similar to that required in the photolithography technique. Furthermore, a microfluidic device can be manufactured using a transfer molding technique. However, this method may produce a product at a high temperature and pressure in a
