Elevator An elevator is a moving staircase or sometimes a shaft conveyor used to transport people and/or cargo between floors in buildings. This is in contrast to a lift, which only moves up or down. The term elevator can be used to refer to both moving staircases and moving shafts or lifts. The difference between an elevator and a lift is that an elevator has a fixed shaft, whereas a lift has a shaft which moves up and down. A lift may be powered by a combustion engine or an electric motor. An elevator, on the other hand, is propelled by other means - usually an endless belt or a cable; although it is also found as a counterweight-driven or gas-powered or cable-driven version. The shafts of elevators often run in the center of a building with floors above and below them. They are also found that the shaft may be built into a building's walls or ceiling. They may have a single or double flight, and they may be enclosed within a structure such as a high-rise elevator car or an open viewing gallery. A conveyor elevator is a vehicle or machine that climbs and descends by means of the gravitational force of a descending drive shaft and an ascending shaft or cable. They were previously employed as mobile elevators in mines and tunnels, and were later upgraded for use in buildings. Examples include the Ponce de Leon and the Hamburg-Flughafen Rollendienste. Other applications of a mobile conveyor elevator are found in museums, where it lifts art works or the elevator could even be employed to simulate the Titanic sinking, or move a boat out of a flooded harbour. Elevators can also be adapted to move large freight to and from high places, such as at the top of an aircraft, and in marine applications such as oil tankers and large ships. Further applications are involved in drainage systems. In road tunnels that have multiple levels, an elevator allows workers to move about freely between levels. The term "elevator" is often mistakenly thought to be a building term for an elevator shaft, but it actually refers to a movable (normally electrically powered) vertical conveyor shaft that can carry passengers or freight.
