Transverse abdominal plane (TAP) motion was measured by ultrasound in 63 children (aged four months to 12 years) and 63 adult subjects, five women and four women aged 20, 32, 37, and 52. Frequency- and time-domain features of TAP motion were used for characterization of TAP motion. The results showed that TAP motion is a random process in children and women and that randomness remains in women through middle age. The time-domain features of frequency and amplitude of TAP motion were similar for adults and children, and the amplitude of TAP motion was limited during the transition from nonpregnant to pregnant in women. These findings suggest that simple time-domain measures are suitable for classification of TAP motion and may be used in clinical and noninvasive research into TAP motion.

On a hot summer night this past summer at one of the last gatherings of Bruce Springsteen's mostly creditable South American tour, a girl in a faded purple T-shirt began her performance with an impressive set of folk and pop standards. It was a textbook Springsteen opening, including "Land of Hope and Dreams" and "Glory Days," and then she led the crowd in the familiar "Born to Run" refrain. The girl's name is Amanda Felder, and she is not a folk singer, but Bruce, who had watched the lights and heard the call, came to join her for "E Street Shuffle." By the end of the night's first encore, the pair of them would also be striking up "Streets of Fire," "Tenth Avenue Freeze-Out" and "Hungry Heart," Springsteen's more recent pop hits. He climbed onstage with her looking like an older version of the young woman in the purple T-shirt, his hair still short and thin, wearing a black and white striped shirt under the black leather jacket he has been wearing nearly all the time, and a black baseball cap pulled down over his forehead. But he's always so much more than the buttoned-down rocker he seems to be at times, and he's not a mere accompanist to a young woman. He's Bruce Springsteen, the master of the stage and the intimacy and the mystery.
