Post Processing When a photograph is exposed and developed and then printed, the colors will not be exactly the same as the colors you saw before developing. By printing the photographs, a few things happen: * The paper will absorb the dyes in the photograph. The color shifts will occur. * Scaling and resizing the picture will also affect the color. All of these effects can be corrected and improved in the development stage. Printing a photograph allows some of the differences in color to take place while the image is viewed on a screen. When viewing a digital photograph, the colors will have changed. The correction of color shift is a common adjustment step in any digital photograph and is called "color balancing." Before printing the photograph, or, as it turns out, before using a printer to print the photograph, the photograph is opened in Photoshop and color balancing is performed. Color balancing is generally done for a photograph of a single subject that is taken at one moment in time. It can be a difficult task when a person is standing in one spot for a long time, and the color shifts can be substantial. However, if an object or subject is not in one position for a long time, the color balancing can be performed fairly easily. A color balancing process involves opening a file in Photoshop and using the Adjustments palette to lower and raise the blue, green, red, and other color values in the image. When the color values are lowered, a blue shift occurs because of the paper used. When the color values are raised, a yellow shift occurs, because the paper has soaked up the color. You will likely notice quite a difference with the mouse cursor, too, because when color values are lifted, the mouse cursor will not move as it would normally do. The most common way to perform color balancing is to open the file in Photoshop. Because the goal is to make the colors and the color shifts more even, the first step is to reduce the color shift as best as possible. To reduce

The type of work Photoshop is used for One of the areas that's often overlooked is the type of work that Photoshop is used for. Photography, graphic design, web design, etc. Photoshop can be used for all of these areas, but it is designed to optimize for one or a few specific areas. Photography Photoshop is a very powerful tool for creating high-quality images. The range of tools used to create, composite and develop images to make them look absolutely great is second to none. There are lots of different people out there who are using Photoshop for the same tasks that they would if they were doing it at home. Web designers use Photoshop for the image editing workflow that they use to create websites. Developers use Photoshop to create mockups and preview products in the browser. Graphic designers use Photoshop to create icons, illustrations, logos, charts and banners, etc. Photoshop is also used by hobbyists to create their favorite images. These might be images of cartoon characters or abstract art pieces that they spend hours creating. Why? Because it is an easy way to show off your artistic skills. An example of a hobbyist using Photoshop: this is an illustration of the dreaded Krabby Patty. Web designers use Photoshop for web design workflow Web designers use Photoshop to create mockups of web pages to preview in the browser or on a mobile device or tablet. This is usually done with the Pen tool or by using tools that mimic brushes. The main reasons for using Photoshop for the web design workflow: Instant previews of designs in the browser or on a smartphone or tablet They can be "drag and drop" from their computer to the web server. They can easily be opened and viewed by the designer and client. Adobe provides a great free program called Muse that is a very good alternative to Photoshop. Caveat: Just because Photoshop can "drag and drop" into the web server, doesn't mean that it is going to work 100% of the time. Some developers and web designers still use Photoshop to create designs. Graphic designers use Photoshop to create images Graphic designers use Photoshop to create documents that are all about images. The designs are usually high-quality images that are used in collateral and business documents. The workflows are similar to web design. Wayne County emergency responders spent hours Saturday, searching through an abandoned house, near downtown Detroit, looking for a missing 13-year-old girl. It took them about an hour to rescue the teen, who, they said, was trapped inside the house without food or water, Detroit police said. "We'd seen a police report, earlier this morning, about a missing child," Detroit police spokesman Officer Dan Donakowski told FOX 2. "The officers were dispatched to that location, and this child came out of that house." Officers and firefighters went inside the house to make sure the child was safe. "We do pretty much everything we can do safely, and that's why we go in and check things out," Donakowski said. "Once we're sure she's safe, we go downstairs and make sure she's OK." The 13-year-old was taken to the hospital and is doing fine, Donakowski said. The house has been deemed safe for now. "We searched the house thoroughly," Donakowski said. "It's abandoned."

Park: Jan Hus' murder an act of 'crimes of conscience' Noticiero Digital Senate Park Saul B. Anza Boulevard at Congress Street, Los Angeles Jan Hus - one of the most influential figures of the Hussites - was murdered on a European street by the order of the local authorities in 1415. The gruesome death of this leader of the Hussites illustrates the cruel reality of a large number of religious and political dissidents who were persecuted under the rule of the Holy Roman Emperor, Sigismund the King of Hungary. It is a reminder that sometimes the struggle for the preservation of human dignity is a dangerous battle against the power of the powerful. A landmark of European human rights history, Jan Hus, a 13th-century Czech priest, was arrested in January 1414 on charges of heresy. He was charged with having published a religious text that read against the Catholic Church doctrine. The text was written in Czech and quickly translated into Latin. Jan Hus, in the name of a religious and political revolution for humanity, went to the Holy Father, in January 1414. He demanded that human dignity should be respected. In his protestations, he violated the persecution of the Catholic authorities. Sigismund the King of Hungary that acted in its turn in the same year forbade theologians

Bill Shorten has blasted Prime Minister Scott Morrison for "trying to shame" Australia's top diplomat Michaelia Cash on Twitter. Ms Cash, who was recently referred to by Mr Morrison as "her friend", hit back on Twitter after the prime minister criticised her during his regular media conference. Mr Morrison said on Monday that "whatever the Prime Minister of Australia does, it's right" but criticised the government's ambassador to the United States for publicly calling the president-elect a racist. 'Opposing view' Mr Shorten said the prime minister's comment was "clearly a deliberate attempt to discredit the Government's top diplomat". He said Ms Cash was "an excellent person who is tough and holds her own". "She has never shamed this country and she will continue to serve our country with integrity and courage," he said in a statement. Ms Cash hit back on Twitter saying Mr Morrison was "trying to shame" her. "I am just a hard-working Australian public servant dedicated to the service of this country. It's disappointing that the prime minister has to say he is defending me on the basis of this," she said. "I don't think anyone has the right to shame a public servant because they hold a different opinion," she said. "The remarks made by the prime minister are inappropriate, unhelpful and detract from the important work I do every day in the great office of Australia's high commissioner to the United States." Mr Morrison's office has not responded to a request for comment. Incoming foreign minister Julie Bishop has also called the comments "unhelpful". "It is not appropriate for the opposition to make any statements when it comes to the ambassador. It is her position. She is a public servant and she should be able to defend herself," Ms Bishop told radio station 3AW.
