I am more than happy to confirm that, yes, we have the right to redistribute that graphic and upload it as part of our review. Just as there are "no-shield" VPN services that don't block access to anything, there are VPN services that allow you to upload all sorts of content freely; they don't just hinder access to sites that they view as undesirable or dangerous, but they sometimes actually give you access to sites with more/better content, so they can offer a better service. The example at hand is just one of many. This seems like a clear violation of the EULA, though, and I'm not entirely sure there would be a proper outcome; to cover the length of that EULA, the DMCA notice wouldn't even be necessary, just a flagging of this review and the resulting copyright claim or something would
