the top of the hill: Public housing in San Diego County as seen from the air The city of San Diego is running out of space to build new public housing units for its homeless population, and while advocates are pointing to market-rate housing, nothing is being constructed. Instead, more than 100,000 people in the country's second largest city are spending most of their days in shelters, housing authorities said. San Diego has the fifth highest rate of homelessness in the country, and a recent project organized by the city estimated that more than 60 percent of its homeless population lives in the county. Jonathan Gallegos, a physician and homeless advocate with the group San Diego Union-Tribune, was on board a helicopter flying over San Diego last week as part of a larger effort to map the county's homeless population. "It is a stark, horrifying illustration of the human impact of the eviction crisis we face in San Diego County," Gallegos wrote. The effort, titled the San Diego County Homeless Community Overview Project, was part of a larger effort by homeless advocates to track the scope of homelessness in the county. “We’re the fifth most homeless county in the nation, so we are doing our part to help bring attention to what’s happening here,” said Jonathan Gallegos, a homeless advocate and physician and with the group San Diego Union-Tribune. The initiative was funded by a $737,000 grant from the Casey

Family Foundation. A year ago, San Diego politicians faced criticism that it was failing to build enough affordable housing, and Mayor Kevin Faulconer called for the development of
