The difference in transforming activity of mutant and wild-type p53 during UV- and gamma-irradiation. Mutant human p53 proteins have been shown to be transformed in vitro and induce tumors in vivo. The transforming activity of normal p53 has not been examined as thoroughly. To study the transforming activity of the p53 mutants, we carried out an assay using CHO cells that are null for p53. We used both mutant p53-transfected CHO cells and the mutant p53-containing DNAs isolated from CHO cells. Both mutated p53 DNAs induced foci formation in the p53-deficient cells with similar efficiency. We also used wild-type p53-transfected CHO cells to show that mutant p53DNAs transformed the CHO cells with much higher efficiency than the wild-type p53DNAs. These results indicate that the transforming activity of p53 may depend on the strength of the protein.
