concentration increased from 1.5 to 10 g/l, indicating the subsequent increase in the positive effect on the removal of heavy metals, which was primarily owing to the enhanced biomass concentration and substrate concentration \[\[B29]\]. On the other hand, increasing substrate concentration beyond a threshold level could result in an inhibition of microbial growth and activity, thus a decrease in the removal of pollutants \[\[B30]\]. The overall removal rate of Cd was higher than that of Cu and Pb; this may be attributed to the higher affinity of Cd ions, or the selectivity of Cd, for the HPCD adsorption, which may be caused by the existence of complexation interactions between various metals and the functional groups of HPCD

\\[@B7\\]. For the fixed-bed column bioreactor, the kinetic data were best described by a Gaussian function. The FTIR results indicated that the HPCD adsorbed from wastewater only adsorbed Cd and Pb. The FTIR of the precipitate and the band assigned to Cd could be detected \\[@B31\\], but no obvious peak was found for Cu. For the activated sludge system, Cd and Pb were not detected in the FTIR analysis of sludge, suggesting that Cd and Pb were not adsorbed by sludge. This study revealed that there was a strong correlation between Cd and Pb removal efficiencies and dissolved HPCD concentrations. The results showed that the adsorption of Cd and Pb by HPCD was mainly through interaction with the functional groups of the adsorbent. The interactions between the functional groups and the heavy metals may be the rate-limiting step for adsorption \[[@B32]\]. In addition, the FTIR results 6d1f23a050
