* Cherie's Tips of the Day * Emma and I went to the movies to see Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles 2 today. The movie started off a little weird, but got better once they got to the action. It is a family movie in every sense of the word. If it wasn't for Emma, I might not even have seen it. She was really quiet and I forgot she was there until I brought her in the car. Anyway, it was a good movie, but I wouldn't recommend it to kids. You can leave early without getting a fuss, but you can't stay. If you want to stay, you need to do the quiet routine, which you can do in your room. When you and your little one wake up in the morning, give each other a kiss and have a hug. Let your child know that you are excited to see him or her, that you have a little surprise for them, but it's a secret. If your little one notices that you are up early, they will want to follow you and see what you have. I told Emma that I wanted to go for a walk. While we were walking, I put a little surprise under our seat. Emma was very excited and kept looking under our seat while we walked. She was in a really good mood for the whole movie. Then when we got home, it was time for bed. You may not know this, but it is hard to get a child to bed. Even if they are old enough, they will demand to "go into the kitchen," or into the "living room." Emma went to sleep almost right away. Before she went to bed, I started the quiet routine. We read a book together, played with some fun toys, and then we read another book. My routine always ends with a story. Emma was tired by then, so she fell asleep fast. I thought it was a good night. The next morning, Emma gave me one of those looks I've been missing all year. It said "You've got to be kidding! You couldn't get me to bed last night! If I had a tantrum, you would have never gotten me to calm down." Now, when she asks me to do something after a night of sleeping in a separate room, I know that I am going to get a long-long argument. I have learned the hard way and it makes me sad.
