A clear example of this would be vaccination against measles: immunization against the measles virus provides protection against the virus that causes the mild disease. The impact of this is reflected on the national and global health status. On the global level, vaccines not only prevent death, but provide the future wellness of individuals. What is in the future for immunosurveillance? First, we must continue to learn and develop more extensively the immunological science. In addition, it is essential that we advance in the following areas: --Detection and vaccine development based on the causative agent;--Use of biomarkers in therapy and diagnosis;--Development of immunity to cope with new emerging viral pathogens. In the area of vaccine design, special emphasis must be placed on the inclusion of conserved regions that confer broad protection against many diseases. This is what is being done with HIV, by the "universal" approach in which T- and B-cell immunodominance may allow vaccine design, to prevent AIDS, syphilis, hepatitis C, and herpes simplex virus. Another strategy for vaccine design is to include mutant strains that have the potential to produce severe infections. For many viruses, this strategy will be very effective, but there are certain circumstances in which the use of attenuated viruses is inappropriate. Another option is that of dealing with potentially dangerous organisms by designing a weakened version that causes "exhaustive infection" that either triggers production of a milder form of the disease or that is transmitted from
