Commercial Sales of Autistic Children: Why are Families Turning Them Over to Do-Gooders? by Ronna Kranz Quote from Washington Post article about "Commercial Sales of Autistic Children: Why are Families Turning Them Over to Do-Gooders?": "The Trager family never had a problem with the state, until the youngest son, Malachi, developed an unusual attachment to another boy, who had become a ward of the state after a reclusive upbringing by a religious sect. Children can become emotionally attached to the caregivers who are appointed to care for them, attorneys and social workers said, so Trager sought out a divorce lawyer to help the state get custody of Malachi and a lucrative house sale to fund his care. It was a plan that would allow children to be freed for adoption. It was part of an emerging business. According to the 2010 U.S. census, there were 943,000 autistic children in the United States. Approximately, one in 88 children, or 1.2 percent, was aut
