Even faster particle simulation than GPC - mnif ===== brownbat All of those posts seem to point to similar insights into the properties of particle simulations (on GPUs, CPUs, GPUs, dual GPUs, GPUs...) I suspect that each step in this progression is improving the tradeoffs, keeping in mind the model and distribution of problems that GPU programming environments are good at and CPU programming environments are not. ~~~ mnif Yes, I think, from the title of the article, it's clear that the previous solver is just a "work in progress". But I guess the next iteration is targeted to be ready for Kd-tree-based simulations, which are popular to implement on GPU's. This might not yet support MD-simulations directly on GPUs, but it should be a good starting point. We have long believed that there is power in the hands of everyday people who have been in charge of challenging injustice and demanding change - all while walking in solidarity with those who already know the value of justice and equality. In West Oakland, as in many other places, we have been working with sister organizations and networks to catalyze a generational conversation about the past and future of Oakland's youth. As we continue to compile footage and interview people from all ages, we can't help but marvel at the prospect of a time when our voices become the soundtrack to our own history. We have a dream of young people walking tall with their own stories and activism at the center of their lives. We can't wait to see how the story unfolds over the coming months. We've also learned many lessons from what we have seen. The most important lesson is that change is possible
