I am confused between these two approaches : 1) create a java file, and write the string inside the file write "Hello world!" inside the java file 2) Write the string inside the file, and read it once, and declare it as a constant e.g. public constraint { public constraint T1 = "Hello world!"; } It is better to use the second one because when we compile this i.e. 2). We compile the program once and keep it as a constant, and we only have to change the content. But after some time, if we want to change the string literal, we have to change the second approach too. A: First up, I think you should not be using a public constraint statement at all - this isn't the way you should normally use class members - you should use a private constraint statement (and then invoke it via a getter, if appropriate). Second, you should use String.format for formatting strings: String s = String.format("6d1f23a050
